

Yolanda McBride is the Director of Public Policy at The Children's Aid Society (CAS) leading advocacy efforts in a range of areas including education, health and child welfare, as well as youth development, adolescent pregnancy prevention, juvenile justice and cross-systems coordination. Before joining CAS, Ms. McBride served in the New York City Office of the Mayor as a senior policy advisor to the Deputy Mayor for Economic Development acting as the mayor's liaison to the New York City Housing Authority. Prior to that, she was a senior policy analyst at the New York City Council, where she built initiatives and partnerships for education, social services and aging programs for Speaker Christine Quinn, including the Middle School Task Force, Adult Education initiatives and Age Friendly New York City. She also spent seven years managing research and evaluation projects at the New York University Institute for Education and Social Policy and began her career at a private foundation granting scholarships to low-income students. Ms. McBride has a Bachelor of Arts in American Studies from Lafayette College and a Master of Public Administration from New York University.